To secure popular acceptance of the armaments program, the existence of external danger has to be systematically hammered into the minds of the people. An incessant campaign of official and semi-official propaganda, financed by both government and big business is designed to produce an almost complete uniformity of opinion on all important issues. An elaborate system of economic and social pressures is developed to silence independent thought and to stifle "undesirable" scientific, artistic, or literary expression. A spiderweb of corruption is spun over the entire political and cultural life of the imperialist country and drives principles, honesty, humanity and courage from political life.

—Paul A. Baran, The Political Economy of Growth, (New York: Monthly Review Press, 1957) pp. 129–30
